

I see that the arguments about lifting the restrictions have boiled down to the belief that someone is having their ability to make more money artificially limited. The lifting of these limits do not bode well, in my opinion. We continue to hear the argument that "look at all the new sources of information you have." This is conveniently forgetting that the largest owners of these outlets are AOL Time Warner, Vivendi, News Corp, and other media conglomerates. Radio companies like ClearChannel have done little to add to the variety of voices available, indeed they have limited the number of voices available due to lowest common denominator programming. The limits should stay in place. Jobs will not be gained nor new voices added to the spectrum through this deregulation: only more pockets will be lined.
